

Adjectives used as adverbs

The category adverb is a grammatical garbage can: The term covers a group of words and functions with only one thing in common: They do not fit anywhere else.

In English a large group of adverbs are formed by adding the ending -ly to an adjective.

- He was not beautiful but he sang beautifully.

This system is not consequent though: Some adverbs do not take the ending and in some cases a different word is used:

- He hit me hard on the nose. (not: hardly)
- It was a good song and he sang it quite well. (not: goodly)

The Danish equivalent of adverbs ending on -ly is the -t form of the adjective:

- Han ikke smuk men sang smukt. (He was not beautiful but he sang beautifully)

Like in English the system is not consequent - in some adverb functions adjectives do not add the -t. The ensuing rules about adverbs from adjectives are not the full truth, but they will help you make the same mistakes as most Danes.

1) Adverbs describing verbs take the -t ending:

- Han gik roligt ned ad gaden. (He was walking quietly down the street)

2) Adverbs describing adjectives or adverbs take the -t ending

Sengen var dejligt blød. (= the bed was soft in a pleasant way)

Han talte dejligt tydeligt (= he talked distinctly in a pleasant way)

3) Adverbs measuring adjectives or adverbs take the -t ending – except for adjectives ending on -lig and -vis:

- Solen var pænt varm. (the sunshine was quite hot)
- Solen var virkelig varm, (the sunshine was really hot) (exception)
- Han gik relativt hurtigt. (He was walking relatively fast)
- Han gik forholdsvis hurtigt. (He was walking relatively fast) (exception)
